Our esteemed contemporary took a jump at conclusions this morning in attempting to point to us as a horrible example of "before and after."

The bullion tax law and the bullion tax agent are all right and both work all right as far as they go, but they do not go far enough, and the fault is with the county assessors of the state.

Statements have been made that the State of Nevada is receiving $100,000 a year from the tax on bullion. This is an error and the reason is plain upon reading the law.

The amount returned as bullion tax are paid to the different county assessors and they in turn make their accounts to the state, giving it the pro rata of all county revenues as provided by law.

This pro rata has not amounted to $100,000 during any one year and none of the bullion tax is paid direct to the state. What the Appeal wants is an amendment to the law that will give the revenue agent real power to compel mining companies to produce their books and to compel assessors to levy the bullion tax properly. This is not done under the present law, thanks to Republican opposition.
